This association of “common good” with “national interest”—raison d’état or reason of state—is made explicit in the so-called “common-good constitutionalism” advocated by Adrian Vermeule. The operative idea here is that a strong executive can and should use administrative law to promote “the common good.”

Liberalism and the Common Good - Law & Liberty

(Compendium, Nos. 402-405) The Compendium ties punishment to justice with two ropes: the common good and law. Nulla poena sine lege: no punishment without law states an old Roman legal principle. This principle is clearly adopted by the Compendium. And since it is a fundamental principle that all law is ordered to the common good of the community, it follows that punishment under the rule of law is justified only with reference to the common good.
